Sylenth1 is an excellent alternative to Massive for new or old school producers or musicians seeking a flexible synth with a defined analog sound. The sounds are fully .Every year, mobile and tablet vendors unveil a handful of new smartphones and tablets. Unfortunately, most of these products feature limited storage, and don't come with support for cloud-based storage. If you spend a good amount of time recording your own music, you know this can be really frustrating. What's more frustrating is that a ton of this content is likely online for free, so your investment in music recording gear just goes down the drain. Thankfully, this may be set to change soon, as a new service that aims to make cloud-based storage of files free for you is set to launch next year. After announcing a bunch of new features and initiatives at its annual developer conference earlier this year, YouTube is now turning its attention to running the company's latest service, a cloud-based video service. YouTube's CEO, Susan Wojcicki, told TechCrunch at a CES event that the platform will launch next year for developers, with the service free to use, but with premium features like improved buffering and video uploads. The service will be similar to services like Netflix and Hulu, both of which offer users free access to vast amounts of content, only YouTube is taking a rather different approach. While offering similar features, YouTube allows users to upload content directly to its servers, as well as access it through its apps. But rather than charge users to access the service, YouTube is offering developers the ability to earn money through advertising. Wojcicki told TechCrunch that while the company has been able to wrangle in $3 billion in annual advertising revenue, she knows that it could do a lot more. The company is already looking for ways to earn money via its apps, and as it builds out its own video services, it can add value to the service by bundling in premium features. And for the company's users, those premium features will get them some free movies and TV shows, for example. Perhaps more importantly, however, the service will be free. While Netflix will charge people between $15 and $20 per month, YouTube doesn't plan to charge people a dime for its service. In fact, the company says it
